

Following last month's comparison of Google and Wolfram Alpha, Steve Iatropoulos from Microsoft wrote reminding us about Bing, Microsoft's new search engine (www.bing.com). Microsoft calls Bing a decision engine (see www.decisionengine.com for the MS tour) that is capable of returning more user friendly and validated results - presumably than Google, although they don't say that.

How does it compare? Make your own test - visit the Black Dog comparison site and run your searches side by side through both Google and Bing simultaneously. The most obvious visible differences on the Bing search screen are 'instant excerpts' - roll overs that let you see the contents of a link without clicking on it -and a sidebar detailing related searches (similar to Google's Show options... button).

PS Why did they call it Bing? Is this the electronic equivalent of the old cash register ching as money pours into the MS advertising accounts? The Encarta definition of Bing says it is an old Scottish noun meaning "a heap, or pile of something". Steve! - tell me it ain't so.
